QUOTE of the WEEK

OUR blessed Lord had two great objects before him in his ministry. The first was to preach the word to the outlying masses, that out of them he might gather a people to himself who should be his disciples. This part of his work he carried on with great assiduity and perseverance, traversing the Holy Land from end to end and finding here one and there another, but never ceasing to preach the gospel to the crowds that flocked to him. His second object was to train those who became his disciples, that having gathered them to himself he might educate them in the truth. He taught them concerning the Father and his love; concerning himself, his work, his death, and his resurrection; and concerning the divine Comforter and his indwelling, and all else that would make for their progress and profit. While our Lord was here he gathered the men together who should carry on the work after he was gone. He did not think it enough to make converts: he wished to make disciples. He did not think it enough even to make beginners in discipleship; but he would have them advance in knowledge and in holiness, learning till they were able to teach others also. To this day this same double work is carried on by the divine Spirit through the ministers and servants of God. We are to preach to the multitude who make up the outer ring; for our Lord has said, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." We are bound to evangelize all, making no distinction of rank or character: to every person with whom we may come in contact we are to proclaim the kingdom of God. That being done, however, the minister's work is only begun; for he is now to go on to expound the mystery, to open up the higher doctrine, to lead the disciplined ones into the deep things of God, that there may be in the church fathers, instructors, and leaders, and that the church may in all the generations yet to come, until the Lord himself appeareth, carry out the glorious purposes of God for the upbuilding of a spiritual house and the conquest of the world.
